

Engagement and managing the client retainer

Stephen Bubb, Risk Manager, LPLC

CPD units: 1 Professional skills

Practitioners need to develop an engagement habit with a routine process to access every client and every matter before you agree to act. Identifying the client, scoping the work, considering your capacity to do the job and identifying the risks should be done before you accept the engagement.

Before you accept instructions to act think:

Right client

Identify the client.

Multiple clients or multiple roles.

Is there a potential conflict?

- Unrepresented parties.
- Call it out who you do and don't act for confirm in writing.
- Client capacity and authority to give instructions.

Is this the right client for you?

- Are there any red lights or warning bells?
- Are they family or friends?

Right time Is this work at the right time for you and your team? Your personal situation. Your team and the firm's capacity. Do you have the support required to do this job? Control your workload. The decision Engagement requires a conscious decision. If yes - confirm the full scope and any exclusions in writing. If no - confirm in writing that you don't act. Do non-engagement letters to close off potential clients. Always confirm in writing and leave nothing in doubt.
